Dear readers,

I am glad that in times of "ASAP or before" it is possible to find time for publishing scientific results. At present, the whole issue of science and research acceptance is changing and every new researcher finds it not only difficult to get grant funding but also difficult to go through improving the quality of his or her publications. We are focused on Web of Science and Scopus statistics, number of articles, citations and h-index. Anything not indexed in these databases is considered to be of inappropriate quality and unworthy of respect. And this is a big mistake. Thanks to this approach, in the near future, these databases will be filled with contributions of variable quality and the overall level will inevitably decrease. In addition, periodicals not indexed in Web of Science or Scopus will disappear as authors will not be willing to publish in them.

I am glad this is not the case of our magazine. We were never interested in large numbers of published articles yet we are still publishing. I believe this is because it is better to publish interesting and quality articles in a small scale rather than vice versa.
